

Legal ivory auction breaks French price records

A French auction of legal ivory broke records on Saturday, with prices reaching up to 1,000 euros a kilogramme ($630 a pound), according to Alexander Debussy, associate director of auction house Cannes Encheres.

All of the lots were acquired before 1976 -- the only type of ivory that can be legally sold since a global ban on the trade in 1989.

The top lot -- two tusks weighing 120 kilogrammes (265 pounds) from an elephant that was "shot in 1966 by an Italian fighter in Kenya" -- went to a wealthy Qatari for 125,000 euros, the auction house said.

An Armenian collector paid almost 69,000 euros for another lot, which included two tusks around 230 centimetres (90 inches) long from an elephant killed in the Central African Republic in the 1960s.

All in all, 600 kilogrammes of ivory, made up of 47 tusks separated into 27 lots, went under the hammer for a total of 520,000 euros.

"The selling price for these lots was around 800-1,000 euros per kilo, compared to an estimated price of between 300 and 500 euros per kilo," said Debussy.

Many of the lots were sold by people who have spent their lives in Africa but who, after retiring to the French Riviera, need to supplement their pension, said Debussy.

"Often they are very attached to the tusks, which are souvenirs of their life there," said the agent, who specialises in this type of sale.

Last month France crushed three tonnes of illegal ivory worth an estimated one million euros in a ceremony at the foot of the Eiffel Tower, the first major crushing ceremony in Europe since the global ban.

Elephants are being massacred to produce ivory that is in high demand in the rapidly-growing economies of Asia, particularly China and Thailand.

Chinese buyers are very keen on ivory goods because "in China, it is a sign of wealth" said Debussy, adding that "brokers from all over Europe attended the sale".

One Chinese buyer set another record, paying 62,500 euros for a pair of tusks from the Central African Republic.
